The ribosome plays a crucial role in regulating protein synthesis in all living organisms. Recently, the discovery of RNA-dependent RNA polymerase and self-priming activity of yeast ribosomal RNA has provided additional evidence of the existence of an RNA replicator system in the ribosome. It is recognized now that the three proteins of bacterial elongation factor 2 (EF-Tu, EF-G and EF-Ts) are involved in both translation and transcription. Furthermore, eukaryotic elongation factor 1 (eEF1A) stimulates peptide bond formation, and the kinase activity of this factor (eEF1A kinase, eEF1AK) appears to be necessary for cell division. Moreover, it is known that aminoacyl-tRNA synthetases associate with ribosomes and play a role in translation through direct interaction with elongation factor 2 (EF2). Since the role of tRNA in protein synthesis is widely recognized, it is possible that the newly discovered RNA replicator system may be the origin of the control of aminoacyl-tRNA synthetases in addition to the ribos
